Europe's Largest Business Security Services Organisation Appoints New CEO

QinetiQ Trusted Information Management, a world leader in business security management, has appointed John Holland as Chief Executive Officer.

Part of QinetiQ (formed from the majority of the Government's Defence Evaluation and Research Agency), QinetiQ Trusted Information Management offers a complete range of professional services, managed services, digital investigations (forensics) and security education for large companies, financial institutions and government organisations.

John Holland brings 25 years' IT industry and security experience to his new role. Prior to joining QinetiQ, John was Vice President Worldwide Security Services at Symantec, where he was instrumental in building Symantec's Professional, Education and Managed Security Service capability.

John joined Symantec from a successful role as Vice President for Europe, Middle East and Africa, for AXENT Technologies, where he was responsible for building the company's enterprise security business in the region. AXENT counted over 40 of the Fortune top 50 companies among its international customer base.

John Holland commented: "It is very exciting to join an organisation with such a strong business security and commercial pedigree, and to work with people globally recognised as experts in their field, whether in different aspects of enterprise security, computer crime investigation or forward looking security research. There is an increasing market for professional and managed business security services which QinetiQ Trusted Information Management is uniquely placed to deliver."
